LONDON, January 11.

This day his Majesty, attended by the right hon the marquis of Hartington, and the lord of the bed chamber, went to the house of peers, and opened the session of parliament with the following most gracious speech to both houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I HAVE received so many proofs of the good affections and zeal of my people for my person and government, that every opportunity of meeting them in parliament gives me a new satisfaction. The maintenance of the general peace, already happily established, is so desirable for all Europe, that all my views and negociations have been intirely calculated and directed to preserve it, and secure its duration. I am still proceeding, and shall continue to act, upon the same principle; nothing being capable of giving me so much comfort, as that my good subjects may long enjoy the happy fruits of the present tranquility. I have the satisfaction to be assured of a good disposition in all the powers in alliance with me, to adhere to the same salutary object; and the measures which have been taken in different parts of Europe for that purpose, cannot fail to give additional strength and solidity to the provisions made by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons.

The estimates for the current year shall be laid before you by my order. I have no supplies to ask of you, but what shall be necessary for the ordinary services, and such as have been already communicated to you, and for the security of the nation, and the support of its trade and commerce, on which the essential interests of this kingdom depend. I must at the same time, earnestly recommend the continuance of your attention to the reduction of the national debt, the improvement of the public revenue, and augmenting the sinking fund.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I hope you will find, that the laws made the last session of parliament, for suppressing those crimes and disorders which have been so justly complained of, have had a good effect. Whatsoever is farther necessary to perfect so laudable a work, deserves your serious consideration; that whilst we enjoy peace abroad, we may maintain good order and regularity at home. My hearty concurrence and endeavours shall never be wanting in any thing that may promote your welfare and prosperity.

CHARLES-TOWN, March 26.
